THE PRESIDENT'S VIEWS.

The Boston Journal of last Friday contains the following:
"A gentleman from Boston called upon President Grant on Monday last to thank him for his veto message and the beneficial effect it had exerted upon the finances of the country at home and abroad, when the report of Mr. William Gray of his interview with the President was made the subject of conversation. The President remarked that Mr. Gray had given a very correct impression of the interview, although it was not expected that it could have been reported in the precise language. He said as to the original legal tender acts, they were not now open for consideration, nor even criticism; that when they were adopted they were adopted by loyal men for the salvation of the country, and with them the war had been successfully carried through, and it was only with that success, and the results growing out of it, that we had any country or currency either to regulate. This, the President said, was the point that he himself had apprehended in his mind, and which he intended to impress upon Mr. Gray and those he represented. On the question of using the reserve for the purchase of long bonds, he said that what he wished particularly to present was the fact that as taxation was then producing a revenue to excess of expenditure, and still the national credit abroad at home was not directly strengthened by that fact, he had fixed upon the policy of buying, or, in other words, paying the long bonds, for the reason that this improved the credit of the nation wherever these bonds were held, which extended throughout the financial world; and the bonds, moreover, themselves were then overdue in one sense, as they had then become payable at the option of the government, and the government having a surplus of revenue this option to pay became a legal obligation.
The President further said that he was in favor of going further than Mr. Gray or his committee had suggested, and it was merely following out the same line of policy. He said the legal tender acts themselves should now be repealed; and he worked out their whole effect; they had carried the country through the war, and were no longer necessary, and he hoped that Congress, during its present session, would repeal all the legal tender acts, such repeal to take effect January 1, 1875, and that thereafter all contracts should be made on a gold basis. He said it would seem that this could be done without any disturbance of commercial or financial interests of the country, and once accomplished, all temptation to inflation was ended.
As to the taking away from New England the excess of bank circulation, he said that it really amounted to nothing. The banks from the East were now returning their circulation and withdrawing their bonds much more rapidly than there was any demand from the West and the South for the circulation. He thought that the figures would show within the past few months that more than double the circulation was being returned from the East than was asked for by the South and West. He said that he did not think the Currency bill, if he were to sign it, would have produced inflation in the present condition of the country, as there was no demand for additional currency, and no use for a large proportion of what we now had; but that the danger was in the future, and it was a step in the wrong direction, that any increase of irredeemable paper would vitally injure the national credit, while on the other hand an unlimited issue of redeemable currency could do no harm. He was in favor of free banking, but with it, and as an inseparable accompaniment, he insisted that we should have redemption, and he was willing to give to the West and South free banking based on redemption, and this he wished had taken pains that his friends in those sections should understand.
The President said he was in constant receipt of communications from business men, bankers and public men at the West and South, expressing on the part of the writers their original anxiety for the passage of this bill, or some similar measure as a means of relief at the present time, but nearly all of them assumed that the effect of the message had been to restore confidence and give permanence to the future course of the Government, that was fully as great a relief and more satisfactory to business interests.
He further said that while his communications from New York and the East were almost all in approval of his course, the action of the South and West was nearly as unanimous, and from all this he hoped the very best results to the country, and very likely the benefits would far exceed the expectations of any one. The President seemed as decided in reference to his future action as he had been in the past. He expressed the greatest kindness to all parties, especially those who might have felt disappointed at the course which duty had compelled him to take.
